The Board was of the view that the public good would be injured if this film were made available to persons under 15 years of age who are likely to be both insufficiently emotionally equipped to cope with the depictions of violence and not as knowledgeable about the historical context in which the events in the film take place. In the Board's view, person's 15 years of age and over are more likely to be emotionally equipped to cope with the scenes of violence and are more likely to have studied in school the history of the twentieth century. They would consequently be able to recognise the significance of the film without being overwhelmed by its depictions of violence. The Board consequently classified Saving Private Ryan as "objectionable unless its availability is restricted to persons 15 years of age and over" with a notice advising that the film "depicts graphic and realistic war scenes".
